Pat, Clary and Joe's big adventure

By SIGNA BUTLER
Special to The Daily News

If Ken Dryden is wondering what happened to the missing piece of rosewood trim from his new lounge at the Air Canada Centre, he should take it up with a couple of retirees from Halifax.

Same goes for broadcaster Ron MacLean's script from Saturday's Hockey Night in Canada broadcast.

Pat Bray, 66, Clary McInnis, 64, and his brother Joe McInnis, 66, made their first and last trip to Maple Leaf Gardens to see the closing of the last of the original six arenas. The three devout Leafs fans got a lot more than just the regular tourist action.

Saturday morning, sporting Maple Leafs jerseys, Pat, Clary, Joe, and Clary's son Jeff, who lives just outside of Toronto, hit the highway to start their day. Intrigued by the size of Leafs' huge new home, the Air Canada Centre, they pulled into the driveway to get a closer look.

Will make Dryden a pencil set

Jeff noticed the front door was propped open by an extension cord. After strategically moving pylons around the car to avoid a parking ticket, the group walked in. They strolled past construction workers on the concourse level and conducted a self-guided tour from the ground level, to the catwalk, to the corporate boxes.

At the 600-level of the arena they found Dryden's lounge. Everyone agreed the room was breathtaking. And, suspiciously, missing a piece of wooden trim. After all, what could be more important to Pat and Clary, both former carpentry teachers? Feeling guilty about taking some of the loose wood, Pat thought of an appropriate way to pay the Leafs back for the free two-hour tour.

"I think I'll make (Ken Dryden) a nice rosewood pencil set," he laughs.

Next, the Nova Scotia crew travelled to Maple Leaf Gardens. While buying their commemorative programs, they noticed a man signing autographs. Wondering who it was, they joined the queue. Turns out, it was Terry Kelly, a member of the Leafs' advisory board.

When Kelly found out they were Maritimers, he ushered them past security and took them on a tour of Maple Leaf Gardens.

"Up close, it's really just a glorified Halifax Forum," says Clary, noting the tiny referee's room and other smaller areas at the Gardens.

"You go in the director's room at the Gardens and the carpet is all stained; the furniture is grungy and all the pictures are hanging at angles," adds Jeff.

Although the players' dressing room was locked, a CBC crew was set up outside. Hockey Night in Canada host, Ron MacLean, sat nearby, leafing through a book on Leafs alumni.

"Hey, Ron Maclean," bellowed Jeff, as the group went over and took pictures. They talked about Cape Breton, since MacLean's wife is from the island and Clary, Joe and Pat grew up in Glace Bay.

How did these guys get a hold of the CBC script? Their answer: they picked it up on the CBC set, mistaking it for a souvenir menu from the Gardens' Hot Stove Lounge.

Tickets decorated Christmas tree

The voyage to Toronto almost didn't happen. When Jeff got hold of four tickets, he had to persuade Clary and his friends to fork out $400 a ticket. But eventually they decided it was an opportunity they couldn't miss. (And a good buy — tickets in the same section were $650 a piece on game night.) Jeff photocopied the tickets and sent them to Halifax to hang on their Christmas trees.

The final verdict?

"It was a wonderful day," says Clary. "It's too bad the Leafs lost, but the day was definitely worth the 400 bucks."

"My first and last game at the Gardens. I'll get home and think, 'Was I really in Toronto?' It will take a while to sink in," adds Joe.

Some people may say it was an outlandish and expensive trip for a threesome of retirees. But Joe says the pilgrimage was motivated by nothing but pure love for their hockey club.

"The Leafs aren't just Toronto's team, they're Canada's team," says Joe.

Said Pat: "Put it this way, if Montreal played Russia, I'd cheer for Russia."
